Sebelius agency destroyed evidence for PP criminal case

Another layer to the depth of abortion corruption under past Gov. Sebelius was revealed when prosecutors were told that evidence to be used this year against Planned Parenthood was destroyed in 2005 by Sebelius' Kansas Department of Health (KDHE).

Only guilty people destroy evidence!

Johnson County District Attorney Steve Howe inherited this 2007 felony case, charging Planned Parenthood with fabricating copies of state reports missing from patient files.

The case was unjustifiably stalled by the state Supreme Court (from April 2008 to Dec. 2009) and in July 2011, when Planned Parenthood argued unsuccessfully that special trial procedures had to be created to protect patient privacy.

As the next step in the case, Howe's assistant, Chris McMullin, had been deputized as an assistant to the Attorney General and, this September, expected KDHE to hand over original 2003 ITOP [Induced Terminations of Pregnancy] reports.

Each ITOP report must be filed with KDHE by the abortionist and a copy kept in the patient file. These reports do not contain patient names, but do register the date of the abortion, patient's age, fetal viability and whether the abortion was done to prevent irreversible injury or death of the mother.

Copies of 2003 ITOP reports were subpoenaed by former Attorney General Phill Kline as part of investigations into illegal post-viability abortions and violations of statutory rape reporting. Subsequently, Planned Parenthood patient files were acquired and it appears that missing ITOP reports from 2003 were forged in 2006.

DA Howe was able to reschedule the hearing for Nov. 9, to determine if alternative verification can be secured for the forgery prosecution.

Planned Parenthood wants the charges dropped, claiming the report shredding was not done at their request, but was just routine KDHE record purging. But any purging should not have been permitted when the reports were part of an unfinished state investigation, in and out of the state Supreme Court! Key questions remain:

- Why did KDHE not shred the 2003 ITOP reports from George Tiller's abortion clinic, as revealed by DA Howe?
- Who actually did the shredding and under whose orders?
- Why didn't KDHE tell about the destroyed reports during their numerous court appearances and legal filings?
- ITOP copies obtained by AG Kline should still be in the AG's office; if not, has a second case of evidence destruction taken place?

KFL Executive Director, Mary Kay Culp, commented, "Only guilty people destroy evidence! Truly, this indicates that ethics charges in Kansas have been pointed 180 degrees in the wrong direction!" For updates, see: www.kfl.org & click on the KFL blog or sign up for KFL e-mail alerts.

Oklahoma mother gives up her life to save her child

Dottie Mae Crimm

Stacie Crimm, who was told years ago by doctors that she could never conceive, was overjoyed when she learned, at age 41, that she was pregnant. But her joy was not to last long. Crimm was soon diagnosed with cancer and asked to choose between chemotherapy that might save her life, or going without treatment to preserve her baby's life. Read the full story at NewsOK.com

Aborted fetal tissue used to make vaccines

Several commonly-used vaccines are produced using fetal cell lines which were obtained from aborted babies. These include vaccines for chicken pox, hepatitis, measles/mumps/rubella, polio, rabies, smallpox, and more. For more information, and a list of ethical alternative vaccines, see www.cogforlife.org

"Senomyx" flavor enhancers are produced with fetal tissue

PepsiCo, Nestlé, and Cadbury use flavor enhancers developed using a cell line which was obtained from an aborted baby. Multiple pro-life groups are boycotting these products. For more information, go to www.lifeneews.com and enter "Pepsi" in the search bar.

Former A.G. Phill Kline still being railroaded

Former AG and DA, Phill Kline

Even though Phill Kline left Kansas in January 2009, he is still being railroaded for his efforts to hold abortionists accountable for failing to report statutory rape, forging patient documents, and performing post-viable abortions outside the narrow exceptions allowed by law.

As Attorney General, Kline subpoenaed state reports on child abuse and ITOP (Induced Termination of Pregnancy) reports, despite active resistance from staff attorneys for then-Gov. Kathleen Sebelius.

He found that, although 166 Kansas abortions were performed on girls under age 15, only two cases had been reported to authorities, one from Planned Parenthood.

According to Kline, Sebelius closely monitored his investigation into the enforcement of Kansas laws regarding child rape and late-term abortion violations as these were major campaign issues in 2002 and would likely be again in 2006.

When evidence of crimes reached the level of "probable cause" to Judge Richard Anderson, Kline had abortion patient files subpoenaed. The state Supreme Court aided the abortion clinics in stalling Kline from moving forward with abortion prosecutions that two other judges agreed were well founded.

The abortion patient files that Kline eventually won the right to obtain have been used in two grand juries and several court filings, as well as in actions to revoke the medical licenses of George Tiller and Kris Neuhaus. And they have been the subject of various actions from the state Supreme Court—to their consternation.

The Kansas Supreme Court oversees a disciplinary administrator where complaints against attorneys are lodged. Although secret internal inquiries by the Court and the administrator cleared Kline of unethical conduct, he still faces a raft of charges— for which he must foot the bill.

One of the ethics charges is that he didn't tell the Sebelius administration the full nature of his investigations when subpoenaing state reports. In fact, he didn't have to, and a Wichita judge backed that up. However, recent events show Kline had good reasons to distrust her administration. (See page 1.)

The Kansas Supreme Court wants prosecutors to keep hands off abortion clinics, by making an example out of Kline. They will be ruling on the ethics' panel summation against him sometime next year.

Meanwhile, the clinics are also fighting state regulation and inspection of their business and patient records. (See page 3.)

Rejection of all oversight shows making abortion legal was meant to protect abortion, not women

Mary Kay Culp, Executive Director

In a speech I gave on the Kansas State Capitol steps last January, I listed the recommendations of the Pennsylvania grand jury that investigated “House of Horrors” abortionist Kermit Gosnell, because they mirrored our own 2011 legislative objectives.

The grand jury said that to prevent this from ever happening again, one thing that had to change was for state inspectors to be allowed to review abortion files onsite.

The Gosnell grand jury pointed out that it represented the gamut of opinion on abortion, but that every member completely agreed on their strongly worded recommendations.

Two employees have already pleaded guilty to charges of murder, including the killing of one pregnant mother, and the routine killing of born-alive late-term babies. Those babies that escaped failed abortions were killed by having their spinal cords cut. If you have the stomach for it, read the entire report at <http://www.phila.gov/districtattorney/PDFs/GrandJuryWomensMedical.pdf>

It isn't because of Halloween that I'm talking about such gruesome events. It's because the abortion lawyers at the Center for Reproductive Rights have announced plans to file suit against our state's newly revised abortion clinic regulations (or rules) that will replace the temporary ones they sued in July.

The abortion industry complained loudly about preliminary regulations dictating janitorial and surgical room sizes, temperature ranges, and post-op retention times.

Some of the abortionists' concerns have now been moderated but, as predicted, they remain very unhappy. The main reason? Because they resent the new mandate for two annual clinic inspections during regular business hours, during which “all records shall be available at the facility for review” by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment (KDHE).

Abortion was legalized with the slogan: “Make abortion safe and legal.” In reality, legality has protected abortionists, not women, and it certainly didn't protect viable babies in Pennsylvania, nor here in Kansas, despite laws firmly in place. No, we have only one law to thank for bringing down Gosnell's 20-year reign of terror: the law against selling illegal drugs. It was drug inspectors who turned him in!

The drug folks helped us here in Kansas, too, when Tiller-friend Larry Buening, the long-time head of the Board of Healing Arts was finally removed—not because of our long-time contention that he facilitated illegal late term abortions here, but because of his inaction to stop a pill mill doctor and doctor's wife accused of causing 54 deaths. Go drug enforcement agents!

When a new and fair director replaced Buening he only lasted a year. He was asked to resign at the same meeting where he was attempting to get the Board to investigate Kansas late-term abortionists!

The abortion industry and those protecting it here has spit and hissed and bit, and gone to great lengths to ruin Phill Kline. Now it appears that the abortion industry's political friends selectively destroyed evidence—anything to prevent access to their files by law enforcement. Now they insist health inspectors not have access either!

39 years after pro-abortion feminists claimed legality was meant to make abortion safe for women, I have a question. With no law enforcement or health inspections allowed, how, exactly, is that supposed to happen?

POSTER CONTEST

DEADLINE DEC. 16, 2011
